The fact that but from thirty to fifty men from each local exemption board are to be in this party is causing much disappointment. For the most part the drafted men have wound up their outside affairs and are eager to don the khakl. The sooner they are summoned to Camp Upton the better pleased they will be, and they besiege the local boards with pleas that they may soon be in the cantonments.

Those conscripts who have been training with the hope of becoming non-commissioned officers are fearful lest the men in the first contingents will have too great an advantage over them by reason of the training that they will have received before the cantonments are completed and filled.

In notifying the selected men to entrain during the latter part of the week, each local board is also summoning five alternates who are to fill up possible gaps in the ranks. These alternates will not receive red cards, but will simply be ordered to be on hand as they may not be needed.
